Well may the thoughtful, conservative weil may the thoughtful, conservative citizen arch his eyebrows in astonishment and exclaim, "Whither are we driffing?" Rev. Robert Collyer, of the Church of the Messiah, in this city, in a recent sermon on marriage and divorce, declared in his quaint and forcible style, that "the aver generative look or with declared in his quant and forcible style, that "the new generations look on this old sacred compact as a rollicking holiday business about which they need feel no concern, as they can so easily throw off the yoke."

People have learned that it is true in-deed that they can easily throw off the yoke, and throw it off too, lawfully, if not yoke, and throw it off too, lawfully, if not in one state, surely in another. In a country bound together in every direction by the greatest system of railways in the world, making the land between the oceans, and from the tropic to the frozen zone, common and easily accessible over these rapid-transit, iron thoroughfares, how easy it is to dwell where one will! His abode to-day is the land producing figs and pingapules where the snow-flakes.

These facts are clearly and forcibly llustrated by Mr. William L. Snyder, in is recent book on "The Geography of Marriage," and which has already reach-d a second edition. It is true, as Mr. snyder says, that in matters pertaining to this subject, the inquiry presents solely this subject, the inquiry presents solely question of geography.

The beautiful sentiment in Stephen's love song, "The Silver Line," is clothed with poetic beauty in South Carolina perhaps where there is no such thing as ringe de is not innited by state lines. But the cruel code of Montana robs it of its grace and measing. The numbers in-terpreted in the light of its strange law, become superb sarcasms and delicate irony, because the law declares that the wife is entitled to a divorce because the husband has left Montana and does not intend to return.

Equally absurd is the law of Washington, now framing its constitution as one on, now framing its constitution as one of the states of the American Union; for, of the states of the American Union; for, according to its statutes, a couple may dissolve their marital status, by exhibiting any cause deemed by the court sufficient, when satisfied that the parties can no longer live together. In other words, the court may, in the exercise of its sound discretion, put asunder what God has joined together. Westward the course of empire, westward also the nigring, tired empire, westward also the pilgrims tired of their matrimonial obligations, in search of their matrimonial obligations, in search of a convenient tribunal within which to throw off the conjugal yoke. These lax rules of domestic life in Montana, New Mexico and Washington invite thither ed from the bond assumed a to be released from the the altar of Hymen.

But it is not necessary to go west in order to get a divorce for light and trivial causes. In very many states all over the country are to be found ample provisions which afford easy relief. Many states have in their divorce laws what is commonly designated an "omnibus clause." After defining some of the grounds universally recognized, light and trivial causes, such as settled aversion, incompatibility of temper, gross misbehavior or wickedness in either of the parties repugnant to and in violation of the marriage contract, are grouped together and form the "omnibus clause," which is regarded as a god-send by discontented couples. Perhaps violent and ungovernable temper and "settled aversion," may be feigned more readily and encouraged more easily order to get a divorce for light more readily and encourage

In Vermont it must appear that there.

In Vermont it must appear that the has been "intolerable severity," and in Florida "habitual indulgence of a violent and ungovernable temper" must be most readily obsained in the American wide field embraced in the American commonwealth, it will be seen that in some states divorce is practically free.

Look, for instance, at New Mexico, Montana and Washington Territory, the two latter about to don the garb of state-hood. In Montana, if the husband willifully leaves without intending a return, the wife, for that reason, is entitled to sue for divorce. The lawyers say that law is a rule for civil conduct, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitled the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitled the prohibiting what is right and prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical utility is to entitle the prohibiting what is wrong; that its practical wrong whether with the prohibiting what is wrong; the pro and ungovernable temper" must be shown. WHITECHAPEL SCENES

The Domain of Jack the Ripper Teeming With Thugs and Crime.

New York Herald: Come and take

New York Herald: Come and take a trip through the domains of Jack the Ripper. Through the dark and noisome lanes of Whitechapel, pregnant with crime and teeming with thugs and thieves. We will take a detective along. It is a very necessary precaution.

It should be explained for the benefit of those not familiar with the geography of London, that the Whitechapel district is a colony of theires, situated nearly north of the Tower of London on the Thames. A few blocks down the river are the famous London docks. Many of the lower classes of men employed along the river and the NUMEROUS WATER THEVES of the wharves live up in Whitechapel. A hundred years ago, in the time of

of the wharves live up in Whitechapel. A hundred years ago, in the time of George III, Whitechapel road was just outside the walls of London—a sort of suburb for the poorer classes, who had little money to pay for rent. Now it is in the center of a vast and populous district, with well paved streets and alleys (thanks to modern jumpysympts) cutting the to modern improvements) cutting the district in every direction with horse railways and principal streets which in olden ways and principal sizetes which in older times were the king's highways. Vast warehouses, private and bonded, and manufacturing establishments rise darkly and silently in the night on the border and silently in the night on the borders of these slums.

Then there are big breweries, hospitals cometeries, almshouses and other institu-tions not far away. A surprising feature of the neighborhood is that well-lighted of the neighborhood is that well-lighted streets with tramways and 'bus lines are but a few squares away from where these murders are committed. The Whitechapel district may be likened to certain localities in the country where swamps, filled with pestilential vapors, lie between the great highways. A visitor walking up Whitechapel road would little dream of the horrible dons within a stone's throw of the brilliantly lighted stone's throw of the brilliantly lighted shops. Only the policemen on duty there recognize the flashily dressed men and women who hurry along the pavements as the worst type of London thieves and murderers. Their restless eyes and scarred faces long haunt one after he takes a second look into their villainous countenances.

DARK AND GLOOMY

It was but a few minutes after the detective turned off the Adigate road that we found ourselves in a dark crevice-like lane, with the darkest and most forbidding stone's throw of the brilliantly lighte rising on every side of us. The streets are as well paved as Broadway in New are as well paved as Broadway in New York, but some of them are not more than five feet wide, and then we entered this Petticoat lane of history, celebrated among thieves from Cheyenne to Australia, all the world seemed cut off. A feeling of unutreable leathing and horror came over one as he caught sight of the scenes within the tenements. The lane is the headquarters of the most dangerous thleves in Europe. Every class and nation is represented. Low Jews, Gentiles, convicts and prison birds of all descriptions swarm the place like vermin. "As a Satusday night scene, the region of Petticoat has no equal on the globe," and the detective. At every few steps were the passage-ways leading out of the lane like tunnels in a mine. No cave could be gloomier or more forbidding. As we walked up As we walked up

THE LONG BLACK ALLEY,

THE LONG BLACK ALLEY, called Petticoat lane, one of the government officials said to me, "You see Dickens did not exaggerate." People unfamiliar with these districts think Dickens drew his characters from imagination. The man was right; the Smikes and Oliver Twist, the Fagins and the Dick Swivellers were as thick as files. An ordinary American child would live about three days in such a place, yet there were hundreds of children hardly able to ring out on the night air as they do in Christian lands where thieves and mur-derers are not so near civilization. We next came to the celebrated

We next came to the celebrated PRYING PAN TAYENN which is the rendezvous of dissolute characters of the lowest type. We entered the little room where only "first-class" custom are are served. In spite of the detective's efforts, a couple of young thieves got into the room and proceeded to order "bitter" for two, apparently as an excuse to be on hand should there be a chance to steal a watch or cut a throat.

One day he told the following stear to explain why the Googra Machine and the property of celebrities. One day he told the follow-ing story to explain why Sir George Mac-bonald, the celebrated surgeon, had giv-en up the practice of his profession for five years, just when five years' practice was most valuable to him:

"When Sir George McDonald," he said, "began the practice of surgery the fates seem to smile on him. From the time in entered Edinburgh university he was recognized as a wan of centure and fates seem to smile on him. From the time he entered Edinburgh university he was recognized as a man of genius, and the great eminence to which he has raised himself was confidently predicted, both by his professors and his fellows. He knew that a few years after he graduated a professional chair would be waiting for him and is the still more distant.

"Just as his knife touched the man's breast Dr. McDonald sprang back with a startled look. Was it possible that the eyelids had quivered? No; it was only some passing draft which had made the light flicker over the dead man's face; and calls and social duties, they began to ustill be would make sure. There was no pulse; everything proved that the man was dead beyond peradventure. Then he proceeded with his dissection. Slowly and carefully he removed the outer skin. Then two ribs and a part of the breastbone were taken out and laid aside. At last the diseased heart, which had Prohibitianist Wikhast Pants At last the diseased heart, which had been the cause of the death, lay revealed. All this had taken time and the doctor was hungry. "Now, look here, Dutchy," said the tramp. "you make an assertion that I can't permit to go unchallenged. You intimate that I am a beery bum, and that the country is already overflowing with people of my class. That is a serious imputation. Without making shy specificenial in my own case, I must speak out in behalf of my outrasred countrymen. Now pay attention to me," and he fixed Mr. Pfallegraff with his boosy eye. "I take it that you have seen the figures just issued by the chief of the Bureau of Statistics at Washington?"

Wasco County Sun; The constitutional convention at Olympia are having a hard time with the preamble to their constitution. As reported from the committees the preamble read: "We, the people of the State of Washington, to preserve our liberties, do ordain this constitution." Mr. Lindsey, Mr. Turner and others offered amendments, the substance of all being the insertion of the sentence, "Grasted to Almighty God." The most of the day was spent in debating this question, and upon being put to a vote, the amendment failed to carry by a vote of thirty-three to thirty-three. The presimble was then revetered to the committee.
