My grandpa was Chinese-Vietnamese, so my dad's family was labeled a "Chinese Family" under the lenses of the government. My dad, Quang, was born in 1963, during the Vietnam War. Soon after the war, an armed conflict between the new Vietnam and China arose and the Vietnamese government started deporting Chinese communities living in Vietnam. My dad's family decided to leave for Hong Kong. This is where my dad's boat journey began.

The part of my dad's journey that touched me the most was when he jumped off the boat. My dad always cries out, "Why did I jump?". I've always wondered why. Maybe he felt like he had nothing to live for. Or maybe it was courage.

Fortunately my dad's feet touched sand and his family eventually made it to Hong Kong, where he lived for a year until he moved to Washington.

In the U.S., whenever we talk about the Vietnam War, it largely focuses on the American experience during the war. This isn't bad, but we should also discuss the population most affected during the war, the Vietnamese people who had no choice but to live under a communist regime. My parents both were deeply affected by the Vietnam War. My dad had to leave his home and my mom had to marry a random guy she only knew for three months to find a better life for me and my sisters. This story is a tribute to my parents and the sacrifices they made for me.
