SHE WAS POISONED!

Read by anything else drank or took, but by bad blood. Is it any wonder she feels "blue"? In most cases blues are only another name for bad blood. A man or woman feels unhappy. Life seems dark. The heart is heavy. Bad blood is carrying its poison all over the body, and we call it "blues."

Read these experiences:
Mrs. C. G. Hutchinson, of Pittston, Pa., says: "I consider Dr. Acker's English Blood Elixir the best medicine in the world, not only for blood troubles, but also for dyspepsia, with which I have been afflicted."
"Both my wife and myself firmly believe that Dr. Acker's English Blood Elixir is the best of all blood medicines, and will remove all impurities of the blood."
Geo. V. Souther, Valley City, Dak.
"This grand Elixir is sold by druggists in all parts of America. It is a pure, honest medicine; not a cheap snake-poil. Try it to-day."

MISS CLARE.—Continued.

Miss Clare looked at me attentively and said:

"It's of no use—you can't succeed; not because you have not the will, but because your physical nature. Yield, throw aside your pride, and humbly wait till nature recuperates herself."

I did not answer till I reached my own door; then, as I rested before entering, I said:

"It is hardly consistent for you to advise like that."

"How do you know?" with a surprise that appeared to have a little alarm in it.

"By your face," I said.

She looked relieved, and turned to go. I called her back.

"You must be brief," she remonstrated; "I don't want to have you fainting again."

"I only wanted to ask you, in case I am unconscious, not to allow Mrs. Jordan to have a physician here who is very ignorant. I have little faith in country doctors—not much at any. You'll know by his appearance if he's a quack. Prescribe for me yourself, rather than allow such to attend me. You promise?"

I held out my steady hand. She took it and said, "I promise;" then ran down stairs for Mrs. Jordan. I staggered into my room and fell upon the bed, utterly in the grasp of that unseen, strange power of disease. The next month I met a blank to me, though but for a few blessed memories I should pray that it might be so. There were some moments of calm, moments when I opened my weary eyes in realization of everything around me. Twice I saw Miss Clare sitting near; she gave me back an answering look of intelligence to that which she saw in my face. I did not speak, I had not the slightest wish to do so. I closed my eyes with a feeling of deep and entire relief, for while I realized her presence, I feared no more the incubus of fever.

The days of convalescence at last dawned upon me. Sleep, the merciful and all-healing, smiled upon my tired soul. There were days when it seemed to me that I slept nearly all the time—sleep with a sense of quiet bliss that made me wish for nothing beyond the present.

When I fell into the habit of lying peacefully awake for several hours, I noticed that the doctor came every day. I thought him a quiet, reliable man, who appeared to understand his business. I secretly wondered if he was the obscure fate of practicing in the little village near by. As soon as I had sufficient energy and strength to talk, I asked him where he lived.

"In M., mentioning a city about thirty miles away."

"Do you come from there every day?" I asked.

"Yes; why not?"

I did not reply, but inquired eagerly.

"Who sent for you?"

"I don't know. I only know for whom I was sent." He smiled tantalizingly and went out.

I had not seen Miss Clare since the fever left me. The next time Mrs. Jordan came I asked if Miss Clare would come up a moment. She had gone to walk, Mrs. Jordan replied; she would give me my message when she returned.

I lay dreamily waiting for her coming; my wasted fingers similes playing with the counterpane, folding and unfolding, doubling and undoubling, with the restless wandering of a sick person.

At last—my heart beat heavier as I heard it—a faint rustle of garments in the passage, and Miss Clare opened the door. She advanced with quiet tread in a low chair near me. "Do you desire any information that I can give you?"

"How came you to know of this physician from M.?" I asked, half fearing that it might have been Mrs. Jordan who had procured him. She replied directly:

"A friend of mine in Boston has great faith in him; so, after one interview with the doctor over there in the village, I sent to M. I hope you are favorably impressed by him, for I think he has done very well by you."

"And you didn't like the village doctor?"

"Like him?" with a slight laugh, "he would have bled and blistered you to death; and, as you placed your life in my hands, I felt some compunctions. Though not so tender hearted as I should be, I would be willing to leave you in my enemy in the hands of an ignorant quack."

Her voice sounded so refreshing, so musical, after my long banishment, that I would willingly have had her talk hours, even had she spoken nothing but the veriest insipidities. She sat by a small light stand, on which stood a few vials and a glass she rested one arm on the stand, and bent slightly forward as she spoke; her position one of easy, faultless grace; her form, in its soft, dune-dress, was elegant and bewitching in every curve; the faint fragrance that hung around her stole sweetly upon my senses; and her face—what strange happiness it gave me only to look at her face again! Those large eyes looked quietly at me, or glanced casually about the room. In them lay the wonderful power of her face; in them lay quiescent the fire and sweetness of her soul—the terrible anger and unfeeling kindness of her nature. I saw, too, that her mouth was another index to her temperament; that its proud lips betokened the furious volcanic disposition, which was probably an inheritance, and which she had never learned to control.

"I am very grateful to you, Miss Clare. When I regain a little of my former strength, I will try to tell you how thankful I am; for I did not wish to die."

She rose and moved toward the door.

"You are very weak now, and you exaggerate. Have you any message for Mrs. Jordan?"

"None. Don't desert me in my convalescence, will you?"

"You'll soon be able to desert us," she said, with her hand on the door and a smile on her face.

"But I shall not have the will," I cried.

"Well, good-by." She was in the passage now.

"Good-by," I groaned, rather than said, for all the light seemed leaving the room.

CHAPTER II.

Now that I commenced to live again I grew rapidly better. The pulse of health bounded freer and stronger every day. In my inmost heart I acknowledged that to my illness I owed a nearer approach to Miss Clare than I could have effected in that time by usual intercourse. And, contradictorily, I was discontented and unhappy in thinking so. She had been kind to the invalid; it had now become my dearest hope of happiness that she might some day be kind to the man simply for his own sake.

While I was imprisoned in my room I saw Miss Clare only once or twice; but when I got below stairs and could walk up and down at the sunny side of the house, I insisted upon Miss Clare's accompanying me, and flatly refused to go without her. At first I was sadly afraid she would resist—I saw signs of it in her eyes—and I was already preparing to maintain my request, when she suddenly yielded and gracefully went with me.

The ground was frozen stiff, icicles hang on the old wall sweeps, and the dying sycamore looked wilder and more melancholy than ever. I shuddered with an undefinable dread of something evil to come. I looked at Miss Clare. She was gazing absently at the clear, far off sky—that stately, beautiful sky which sometimes seems so far away from us. Her face was reserved and sad; not as before, as I had feared it might be. I had thought of numbers of things to say to her, while I sat alone in my room; now they all left me, and I spoke in an indifferent tone.

"Now that our New England winter has really set in, I suppose you will be returning to the gayeties of your home."

She turned toward me and spoke quickly:

"Yes, my home?"

"Yes, of Boston," I replied, a little surprised at the peculiar expression of her face and the ironical ring in her tone. "You will prove false to feminine nature by staying away from a city home during the winter season."

I saw that I had chosen an unfortunate subject, but some evil whispering tempted me to continue.

"Are you going soon?" I asked.

"The voice in which she replied precluded the possibility of speaking upon that topic again."

"Really, Mr. Perrom, I have not yet decided."

I had called the cynical expression to her face, and there was no more genial kindness that morning. I regarded at my stupidity—I had forced her to walk with me and then studiously made myself disagreeable. I went out alone the next day and every time after.

Soon I resumed my morning horse-back excursions, and after one or two of those rides I felt the glorious elixir of health again pulsing in my frame; I was no longer weak; I was once more a man among men.

"You could still morning in January I took my pistols from their case and entered Mrs. Jordan's sitting room in search of Miss Clare. She was reading by the fire, and received me with the easy cordiality which sometimes distinguished her, and which appeared entirely at variance with the moods in which she occasionally indulged."

"You remember I promised to teach you to shoot," I said; "I have come to claim my pupil."

Her eyes shone with pleasure. "You are very kind not to forget," she said.

"I must acknowledge it is not a distinctive kindness," I responded, allowing the impulse of my heart to betray itself in my face. I held those eyes to mine for an instant that was forever after remembered by me. Men do not forget the first time the woman beloved comes near to them in one full glance. She did not give me back the passion that burned in my eyes; the language I read was that of surprised inquiry, not of repellant scorn that despised its discovery.

We went out toward the field where she had left her target; still nailed to the tree. No merciful premonition of that which was to come gave me warning to turn back with the girl who walked with me. Happily we went on. Over Miss Clare's face was the soft pride that had enthralled me. Gentler, more kind than I had ever before seen them, her eyes seemed as she talked; in their gray deeps a luminous shadow seemed to dwell that baffled while it drew me on. I loved her entirely, devotedly, with heart and soul and strength, and now I only waited the opportunity to tell her what she might have seen.

"I am going to astonish you," she said, as she took her place to shoot, and fired with the same careless air which I had noticed before. The result showed her improvement.

"You have been practicing," I exclaimed. "It is unfair if you have surprised your teacher."

As I handed her her pistol after loading it she said in a subdued voice:

"Do you know, it seems as if I were infatuated with this shooting? I have come here day after day—I did not exactly like it, but somehow I could not help it. I believe I am superstitious. It seems, Mr. Perrom, that some demon has impelled me to perfect myself in this unwomanly pastime. I have shuddered as I think of some horrible object to which it may lead. Am I talking strangely?" She paused a moment, and then continued with flushed cheeks and wild eyes: "Ah! to what will not my ungodly temper lead me if I am tempted too much! I try to control it, but sometimes I am not mistress of myself. It is very humiliating to think of it."

She put the pistol in her cloak pocket with a gesture of disgust and looked up at me with eyes in which there was a strange, unconscious, beseeching look that thrilled to my soul.

"Miss Clare," I said, in a low, steady voice—"the unaccustomed solitude of your life has made you morbid. The unhealthy impulse you mention is common to sensitive minds, particularly when the surroundings favor it. Pray, has your demon presented himself in tangible form? Has he an eye of coal and a tongue of flame?"

She turned away her face with a look of relief.

"I know I am childish sometimes. I did not use to be so," in a faltering voice. "Do trouble and persecution make one grow imbecile? He asked suddenly, looking at me."

"They do sometimes," I answered.
